Adolescence is a time of significant change, not just physically but also mentally and emotionally. Teenagers often face a variety of pressures, which can lead to stress and anxiety. One of the most common sources of stress is academic pressure. The desire to get good grades, pass entrance exams, and please parents and teachers can be overwhelming. Many students stay up late to study, skipping meals and lacking sleep, which negatively affects their health.

Another factor is peer pressure. Teens want to fit in with their friends, and this can sometimes force them to do things they are uncomfortable with, such as changing their dressing style or even trying bad habits. Social media also plays a huge role in modern teen life. While it helps connect people, it also creates a false sense of reality where teens constantly compare themselves to others, leading to feelings of inadequacy.

To maintain a healthy lifestyle, teens need to find a balance. Physical activities like playing sports or jogging can help release tension. Sharing feelings with parents, teachers, or friends is also essential. Moreover, managing time effectively to ensure enough sleep and proper meals is key to staying physically and mentally strong. Schools and families should also create a supportive environment where teens feel safe to express themselves and seek help when needed.
